Julia had a garden. Her garden had watermelons and vegetables in it. She was very proud of her garden and loved to work outside. It was hard work, but it was satisfying.

Julia carried her ripe watermelons from the garden in a red wagon to her house. She shared her watermelons with her mom, Dana, and her dad, John. They all loved the juicy watermelons and fresh, crunchy carrots.

One day, Dana said “why don’t you sell your extra carrots and watermelons?” And Julia said “okay.” The whole family worked on making a stand to put up by the road near the garden. John worked at the stand, while Julia worked in the garden, and Dana helped people pick out their own watermelons and carrots.

When all of the carrots and watermelons were gone it became winter. So her garden died, But her dad said, that next year she could plant a garden and they all said “yeah!”

The End
